Types of Insurance to Carry in Addition to the Texas Legal Requirements

If you're driving in Texas, you should have at least the minimum $30,000/$60,000/$25,000 coverage required by state law. But if you're in a serious accident, the minimum is rarely enough to cover all the different scenarios that could happen in a car accident. Take a look at the optional car insurance coverage that could save you from further grief in the event of a serious crash!

If both drivers have insurance, whose car insurance pays for my injuries?

Texas's at-fault insurance laws require that the insurance policy of the driver who was most at fault for the accident will cover the damage. This sounds great if you weren't at fault, but there are several issues like underinsured or uninsured motorists that could put a snag in getting compensation.

How do I get eyewitness contact information?

An eyewitness to your car accident can be worth her weight in gold if she sticks around to provide information about what happened in your crash. Eyewitnesses are especially important for hit and run crashes or wrecks where it's unclear who was at fault. Just don't let these valuable sources of evidence walk away from the crash scene before you get their contact information!
